Mistaken Kindness.

Under a spreading chestnut leaf

A grass bird built her nest,

And there her little brood she fed,

And warmed them with her breast.

And in and out she softly flew,

With scarcely room to pass,

So close the prickly coveit drooped

Its curtain on the grass.

A gentle heart, in passing near,

The leafy shelter spied,

And with a loving, kind intent,

Turned the sharp leaf aside.

It really seemed too rough a thing,

To show such a nest;

The prickly leaves would surely unkindling wing,

Or pierce some tender breast.

Alas! the wisdom so untrue

That knew not what it did!

A shelter from a fiercer storm,

The open nest had hid.

And now the cold rain fell and snow

The roofless nest around;

The coveit leaves the storm was gone,

The little brood was drowned.

So may our sharp defenses be,

A proof against grief and care;

A shelter from a fiercer storm,

Or a more fatal snare.

Persistence.

M. F. BERNER.

"It is of no use, Theo, I can't study;

how can any one be expected to, this hot weather? How I wish summer was over, and I was free from books!"

A lamenting Gresham, pushing back the mass of golden hair from her heated brow, sent the large history spinning across the room, and threw herself on a couch.

"Mind, Clem, only a month longer, and this examination is something quite extra and unusual, you know."

The speaker was Theodora Gresham, a young girl of about nineteen years;

she was bending over a large painting in oil, on which she seemed to be beap-ing an unusual amount of care. The two girls were sisters, and were now completing their education. It was twelve months since they had left boarding-school, and since that time they had been taking occasional lessons at the large college near their home.

But now the energies of all the young students were bent on preparing for the annual examination, and it was Mr. Gre-ham's special wish that his daughters should compete for the various prizes.

This was competing for one prize only of that a painting; the prize for this department was much coveted. Clem paused at first one branch and then another, until her friends almost gave up hope of her succeeding in anything. On this afternoon Theodora had to listen to many of her most sincere friends, and this afternoon, and indeed, of nearly everything which Clem talked of.
